Forum on Europe-USA collaboration in Materials Research

Continued progress in materials research is increasingly dependent upon collaborative efforts among several different disciplines, as well as closer coordination among funding agencies and effective partnerships involving universities, industry, and national laboratories. In addition, because of the global nature of science and engineering research, partnerships are important not only at the national level but from an international point of view as well.

This international symposium brings together researchers from Europe and the USA currently supported through cooperative programs between their respective funding organizations to carry out collaborative research projects across the Atlantic, as well as researchers potentially interested in such collaborations. The goal is to provide an overview of the outcome of such collaborative efforts, including benefits derived from the international collaboration and associated challenges and opportunities.

The Forum is open to the general audience and will include oral and poster presentations by keynote speakers and participants, and roundtable discussions among participants and with representatives from funding organizations.
